

The Woman who Opened a Window to the other Side of the World

Lisa Goren describes her passion for her polar art. When you speak to her, you realize that she has the power to make change on this planet using her tools - her brush, her palette and her magical watercolors.

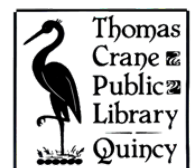

She found a way to communicate with the world and to share the beauty of these cold places. Her art is like a magic carpet. It takes you to frozen lands, makes you feel the fresh cold air and gives a sense of purity and calmness. When you see the wonderful landscape with animals who take care of their land, it makes you think about what we have and what we should save. And that's her message to the world, "Save our Planet." Lisa feels that she is tied to the planet, especially the polar regions, so she uses water to paint water.

Her belief in sharing the world is reflected in her paintings. Her pieces like "Coyote on the Brooklyn Bridge" and "Woman in Gold with Penguin" show how people and animals switched places during the pandemic and highlight the importance of sharing our planet with animals. With every new painting she created new places and spaces to share with us.

Authored by Rana Shokry, intern at SSAC, in partnership with the English Language Program for Adults at the Thomas Crane Public Library. Rana is originally from Alexandria, Egypt.

"I came from the other side of the earth. I came from the desert to see another side of the world through her painting. We come from different worlds and art is the language that we speak."

Lisa Goren, "Coyote on the Brooklyn Bridge" - Inspired by animals during the pandemic. Watercolor, 30" x 22"
To learn more about Lisa Goren visit: <https://www.lisagorenpaintings.com>